Quantum Sense

Here's what I think. I think we're on the brink of a huge change in perception of our world. It has been compared to the Copernican revolution when Ptolemy's Earth centered universe was replaced with Copernicus's bigger, broader view of how things actually are. It's that same crisis/opportunity place that our species found itself when we realized the Earth is round, not flat. Only one thing changed: Everything.

The perception change I'm referring to is the one regarding a classical world view born from Newtonian physics to a new world view held from the precepts of Quantum Scientific principles – in other words, honoring mechanistic and vitalistic principles. Now that cutting edge scientific exploration has caught up with itself, i.e., we can see and measure what was just speculated in our culture before, we realize that we're not floating around on an impersonal, mechanistic, largely empty universe but that we are part and parcel of and in a unified field or inextricably connected and vast organism that is all about infinite potentiality. We know that our intention affects this field absolutely because we are part of it! We now have scientific explanation of how our current forms came to be. We have a time line and reasonable chain of events that point to our collective common origins. We know that our current state - all of what we are and observe was created out of a primal explosion and ongoing expansion that occurred 13.7 billion or so, years ago. It's referred to as the Big Bang. We can't say what occurred before the Big Bang, just like we did not know how the world got flat but did discover it is in fact, spherical. The implication is that more is to be revealed and consistently, more is revealed. When the world 'became' round we still did not know it all, but the world never got flat again...

Now if you're religiously inclined, we're still on the same page. I'm saying that the God of your understanding, and mine, caused the Big Bang (Genesis, in one tradition) and what has happened since is part of the story of God's great unfolding of things. I truly believe in universal/innate intelligence, or an omniscient and omnipresent God, if you will. There are just a bazillion ways to describe God because it's all God and they're all correct!! And, if God created everything, God created 'nothing' as well so...if God exists, God does not exist too! Even our 'atheist' brothers and sisters can dig that, yeah? The key will be when we hold our perceptions of the nature of God as metaphor because no matter how you deal the deck, we all came from the same stuff. Sheryl Crow sings: "We've got great big guns and small ambitions and we still argue over who is God." We can stop that now. Thank you God. Modern physics is showing the way that the latest and greatest scientific enterprise is the exploration of God. How cool is that?

The paradox here is that none of this is 'new'. Native cultures have been telling these stories for all of recorded history and long before that. We now have some ways to measure/see our past and since our culture has been steeped in the 'scientific' process', we, up until now, could not believe it until we could see it. Now we can also see it when we believe it.

Honest to the Big Bang, what a 'bitchin time to be alive. So...what does this have to do with me and you, you say? My practice?? Just that one thing: Everything. Just for starters, to the degree that we can own that we all have the same origins, that we are all connected in the most fundamental way, that what I do directly affects your well being and vice - versa, that thoughts are things and that our consciousness truly affects the form and the circumstances we find in our lives, that we in fact, create our lives.

To the extent that a critical mass of us anchors these present truths by continuing to learn and practice their precepts, we can bring on a brave new world where cooperation, collaboration and the promotion of peace are prime directives. Imagine a world where chiropractic comes first in a health care system that honors personal responsibility and a healing reverence for the whole. A future wherein we are limited only by our thoughts and a firm belief that human intention can and does indeed, move molecules. A place in history where all of our institutions from business practice to the education of our kids is coming from the perspective that what we do in the world affects not just ourselves, but everyone else because we are One.

There is an axiom in the meditation community that says that the square root of one percent of any population is enough to change the world. It is said that as few as 4000 people brought on the Renaissance after the Dark Ages. The square root of one percent of the planet's current population is only about 8000 people.

Are you One of the 8000?

Let's roll.
